Rigidbody2 Eris: The City Of Fire (OBL) Precracked -. its magistrates had been so “criminally negligent” as to render them liable for acts of religious bigotry and discrimination. The defendant was an Australian Christian conservative movement group which distributed flyers in Sydney, Australia with the aim of preventing non-Christian values in New South Wales public schools. The defendant, which asserted a religious exemption from the Racial Discrimination Act, had distributed flyers which described gay men and lesbians as “immoral and sex-starved”, and expressed the view that all homosexual behaviours were “against the law”. The defendant in this case was successful in arguing before the NSW Supreme Court that it had no legal duty to ensure that its flyers were not distributed to public school students. It argued that its position was supported by a “historic understanding of freedom of religion” and “the law as it is understood today”. The argument was that, because the defendant had a religious belief that homosexuality was wrong, it had no obligation to ensure that its flyers did not have this effect on students. The discrimination that the defendant was alleged to have caused could not be regarded as having “legitimate purpose” because, in the defendant’s view, homosexuality was not “in accordance with the doctrine of Christian faith”. In other words, it was a religion-based argument being made in an Australian court which was, in direct contravention of the Supreme Court’s then-recent decision in Newlands v Australian Broadcasting Corporation (No 2) [1995] HCA 38; (1995) 159 CLR 520. In this case the Supreme Court ruled that: “the ABC did have a legitimate purpose in refusing to broadcast a program that was insulting to the plaintiff and was designed to cause mental harm to the plaintiff”. The aim of the flyers was to “lower the morale and general esteem of gay men and lesbian, and to present a negative image of these groups, thereby reducing their standing in 1cdb36666d
